Software developers listen to their customers. This can be shown by the feedback that was given when Apple decided to allow optional keyboards like the Apple Smart Keyboard and Apple Wireless Keyboard to charge on the iPad Pro. For battery charge, a wireless keyboard is essential, and neither the locking keyboard nor the wireless keyboard with a key lock function passes this test. The iPad Pro is a few generations behind the MacBook Pro line in every other area—the iPad Pro will have the new iMac next year—but I'm not sure why its keyboard would have to be a shipped one. I know it's because Apple's own keyboard with number keys is only for Apple devices, not the iPad, or the MacBook. But as of Photoshop CS6, you can license a keyboard for $29; you just can't purchase one for your iPad. It should be possible to purchase a portable keyboard for your iPad, but in that case, you'd better buy it separately. At least at the time of Photoshop CS6. Windows tablets are still doing well. And Windows laptops, even; if you have a Windows laptop, why get the new MacBook Pro? The iPad Pro is more portable, more convenient, and has a better keyboard. And I may be in the minority here, but the interwebs are rolling out Windows 10 versions of all the software Apple users have already paid for. Overall, Lightroom is a solid, feature-rich program with great possibilities. I have very little beef with it. In fact, I wish it was more fully featured in the beginning. I wish it had been a bit more like an actual camera. Lightroom is a great tool and a great program with possibilities and I for one feel good about being able to expand upon it. It's so easy and fun that you would find yourself soon getting attached to it, if you don't already.

To do all of that before taking Photoshop into the browser is a mammoth task. Imagine if you wanted to add all of the feature found in Lightroom to the browser. The plugin would basically be as large as the Lightroom software itself. The logical thing would be to put this functionality into the browser without compromising the features and user experience. What Adobe has done is create a part of Photoshop that mimics the functionality of the plugin. It preserves the power and features Photoshop has to offer and it does so without slowing down your editing process. For your editing though, it will take some time to get used to. The tools in the browser are very different and will take some time to get used to. Another major difference you will notice is that you will not see your files, like in Photoshop. It will show you the image previews like other web browsers. If you need to, you can go into the menu bar and refresh the artboard - it will reveal your images.

If you have an account with both Lightroom and Photoshop, you will still be able to access files from Lightroom via the cloud. So, your work will not be lost. If you have Creative Cloud, you will be able access all of your files on all platforms. As long as you are making photos in Lightroom, you should be able to export those files to the web. Since Photoshop is the most powerful image editing tool on the web, you should be able to get more out of your shots if you have Photoshop.
